Globalisation

How do people feel about globalisation? It depends to a large extent on where they live and how money they've got. According to social scientists, our world is shrinking. However, globalisation, as one report has stated, "is a reality, not a ". Humans have always commercial and cultural connections, but these days computers, the Internet, mobile phones, cable TV and air transport have accelerated and complicated these connections. Nevertheless, the basic dynamic is the same. Goods move. People move. Ideas move. And cultures change. The now is the speed and extent of these changes. Television had 50 million users after thirteen years; the Internet had the same after only five years. But now that more than one fifth of all the people in the world speak at least some English, critics of globalisation say that we are one big 'McWorld'.

You cannot imagine school life today without competition. It is really necessary for children. There are many reasons for that. Firstly, competition makes children see the strong points of their classmates. It helps them develop friendships. Secondly, while taking part in competitive games, children develop confidence. They also cope with their fears. It is also important that competition in school motivates students. It becomes the biggest teacher for them. It makes them understand that it is not what you won or lost. What matters above all is that you did your best. The last but not the least, competition pushes children to compete with themselves. It makes them better positioned for the next time they find themselves in a competition, and this is a great lesson to learn.
